

Dear all,

Taking into account these facts:

- Cultural products are in some way a result of mixing previous material that societies have provided to their citizens.
- An extensive and free distribution of these products to the people would improve drastically our lives
- There is no technical nor legal approach that will prevent people to share digital contents. For each person trying to limit these actions, there are a million people trying to circumvent these limitations.

Why not create a common repository of digital contents, providing free access to all the people, and paying rights fees to authors and editors in proportion to the number of accesses?

There are a lot of money that governments spends on cultural issues, and also to combat piracy. Maybe it required more money from taxes but many people will consider this as the best investment for their money.

I hope you will consider this proposal.

Kind regards,

Antonio Calvo
